Winter is a season known to play havoc with the complexion. How does one combat this problem and maintain a clear, glowing complexion and soft, supple skin ? A wash with hot water can prove to be fiercely drying as it draws out the natural oils and water from the skin. Therefore, as winter draws near, make it a point to lower the temperature of the water you wash your face with. Take added care by being extra gentle with your skin as it is extra sensitive in winter.

Regardless of the skin type, water is one thing all complexions need, as the cold air sucks away moisture from anything it comes in contact with, including our face. To compensate for the loss of moisture it is necessary to fortify moisture reserves. Firstly drink plenty of fluids, as many as eight glasses per day. This will help to keep the skin cells from dehydrating. This also has an advantage of flushing out toxins that lurk in the body during our less active winter months. Some skins regardless of humidity in the air, always feel dry and dehydrated. This problem grows with age. As one grows older the skin gradually becomes thinner and less able to retain its natural water levels. Blood vessels diminish, while sweat and oil glands production decreases leaving older skin prone to dryness. It wrinkles and sags in old age. One of the key factors in delaying the signs of skin ageing lies in retaining as much moisture in the skin as possible.
