'Morality' simply means the principle which tells us the distinction between right or wrong and good or bad. It is something which depends upon one's knowledge of understanding and ability to interpret. As Mahatma Gandhiji says,

"Morality is the basis of things and truth is the substance of all morality". The one's basis of moral values may differ from culture to culture or society to society or community to community, but at the end essence of it remains the same. I date back when I was a toddler; my family continuously taught me to regard others by "Namaste", saying "Thank You", and so on. This is the very beginning construction of one's moral base. As we enter into the age when we start adapting the intellectual teaching of our family, we get bind to moral thinking of the society which we have been taught for long, since born. One's moral values are deeply linked with the culture and religious background. It is not necessary or essential that the moral values will be ethical in the view of different cultures, religion or society. This is where the distinction comes within the society. Ethics on the other part are set of common realized values of the entire society. It may or may not be based on moral values, Ethics is an outcome of one's self-reasoning ability to the practice, behavior, intention, action, even in one's thought also. These are the codified or normative version of do's and don'ts. According to the great philosopher of times Immanuel Kant writes, "In law a man is guilty when he violates the rights of others. In ethics he is guilty if he only thinks of doing so." In short, having adhered to certain a moral value does not make you ethical does make you moral.
